ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This project has taken me from the parkland and the prairie and the big sky country of western Canada to the shield and the rocks and the waters around Lake Ontario and back again. In the process, I’ve incurred many debts, all of which I am happy to own up to now.

First and foremost, I must thank Alvin Finkel for his unyielding support of this book. Were it not for his intervention at a critical point, this book might well have never been published. At Athabasca University Press, Pamela MacFarland Holway ought properly to stand out for her special attention to the editing and production side of things, professionally turning a wayward collection of chapters into a book. Walter Hildebrandt and Megan Hall also played instrumental roles in seeing this book through to publication.

Jeff O’Brien, Saskatoon’s chief archivist, generously provided images and text from that city’s extensive and well-organized collection and adopted an abiding interest in my work that stretches back to my early student days in Saskatoon. For this I am deeply grateful. Especially warm thanks and admiration also go to Bill Waiser, who introduced me to this topic in the first place and who has remained an inspiration ever since.

My friends from graduate school at York University in Toronto, among them Mathieu Lapointe, Liza Piper, James Muir, Lisa Rumiel, Kristin Burnett, Christine Grandy, Ben Lander, Geoff Read, Cindy Loch-Drake, Todd Stubbs, and the late Colin Lund, made my years there more than enjoyable.
Expertly and deftly directing the thesis on which this book is largely based was Craig Heron, a historian who guided me along numerous pathways and corridors I hadn’t thought to look down. His ideas and work continue to inform my teaching to this day.

The Kater family’s warm embrace into their own helped me, perhaps in more ways than they know.

My own family’s constant support and encouragement has been nothing short of, well, everything.

My final thanks go to my wife, Eva Kater, a historian who shows me how to think in new historical ways, and to my son, Jonah, who surprises me at every turn. I only love them more with each passing day, and it is to them that this book is dedicated.
