CONTRIBUTORS

Bart Beaty is a professor in the Department of English at the University of Calgary. His principal research areas are comics and popular culture. He is the author of Comics Versus Art and David Cronenberg’s A History of Violence, among other works.

Jeremy Berry holds a doctorate in communication, as well as an accreditation in public relations (APR), and has a background in broadcast journalism, government, and political communication. He taught public relations at Mount Royal University from 2008 to 2014, during which time his research interests included crisis communications, social media, and government communication. Berry recently left his position as an associate professor at Mount Royal to become the director of media relations at Canadian Pacific Railway.

Duane Bratt is head of the Department of Policy Studies at Mount Royal University, in Calgary. An expert in energy policy, he is the author, most recently, of Canada, the Provinces, and the Global Nuclear Revival: Advocacy Coalitions in Action. He is a frequent media commentator and has been a highly successful lacrosse coach.

Richard Gruneau teaches in the School of Communication at Simon Fraser University. He is the co-author, with David Whitson, of Hockey Night in Canada: Sports, Identities, and Cultural Politics, among many other works.

Harry Hiller is faculty professor of sociology at the University of Calgary. He is the author, most recently, of Host Cities and the Olympics: An Interactionist Approach and Second Promised Land: Migration to Alberta and the Transformation of Canadian Society.

Regan Lauscher is a three-time Olympian and a seven-time Canadian luge champion who also holds a degree in journalism from Mount Royal University. During the 2006 Winter Olympics, in Turin, she wrote an online journal for the CBC detailing her impressions and experiences.
David Legg teaches in the Department of Physical Education and Recreational Studies at Mount Royal University. He is the author of over a hundred scholarly articles as well as the co-author of “Sport Policies Leading to International Sporting Success,” a recent study of sport policies in fourteen countries. He is president of the Canadian Paralympic Committee and has received the King Clancy Award for his work in helping disabled citizens lead more rewarding lives.

Roy MacGregor is a sports columnist for the Globe and Mail and the author of more than forty fiction and non-fiction books. He is also the co-author, with Ken Dryden, of Home Game: Hockey and Life in Canada. He has worked for the Ottawa Citizen, the National Post, and Macleans and has won numerous awards for his journalism, including the National Newspaper Award and the National Magazine Award, as well as two ACTRA awards for screen writing. He is an Officer of the Order of Canada and a member of the Hockey Hall of Fame.

Tom Maloney oversaw the Globe and Mail's coverage of concussions from 2008 to 2013, while serving as the Globe's sports editor. Formerly sports editor of the Calgary Herald, a contributor to Time magazine, and sports columnist for the National Post, he is presently editor of the Globe’s automotive section.

Derrick Newman has a degree in journalism from Mount Royal University, in Calgary, and has worked for various media outlets, including the Calgary Sun, HockeyNow magazine, CTV, and Global TV. He is the commissioner of multiple fantasy hockey leagues and has been involved in a fantasy football league for over a decade. He currently works as a sales representative for Moneris Solutions.

Janice Paskey is associate professor of journalism at Mount Royal University. She is a minor hockey mom, minor hockey referee mom, wife of a minor hockey coach, and board member and communications director for a minor hockey association. Her sons continued to play in body-checking hockey leagues despite her concerns.

Chaseten Remillard is an assistant professor in the School of Communication and Culture at Royal Roads University. His main interests lie at the intersection of visual communication with issues of social and environmental justice. He is currently writing a book on visual portrayals of the homeless in Canada.
André Richelieu taught marketing at Université Laval for close to fifteen years before joining the École des sciences de la gestion at the Université du Québec à Montréal (ESG UQAM) in 2014. He specializes in brand management and sports marketing in the context of globalization and has published extensively in these areas. He is the co-author, with Michel Desbordes, of Néo-marketing du sport: Regards croisés entre Europe et Amérique du Nord (2011) and the co-editor of Global Sport Marketing: Contemporary Issues and Practice (2012).

Glenn Ruhl is professor of information design in the Faculty of Communication Studies at Mount Royal University. His professional interest in sport began early in his career, when he designed the logo for the college hockey team he was coaching. In addition to his work as an educator, his industry experience includes serving as education program manager for the Environmental Services Association of Alberta and as the executive director for Canadian Plastics Industry Association (West). He is a member of the International Institute for Information Design. He holds a PhD in education, and, in 2012, received Mount Royal University’s Distinguished Faculty Award.

Jay Scherer teaches in the Faculty of Physical Education at the University of Alberta. His research interests span the areas of sports and cultural citizenship. He is the author of numerous publications and the co-editor, with David Rowe, of Sport, Public Broadcasting and Cultural Citizenship: Signal Lost?

Angela J. Schneider, an Olympic silver medalist in rowing, teaches kinesiology at Western University in London, Ontario, and has written extensively on the philosophy and ethics of sports and on doping. She was formerly director of Education and Ethics for the World Anti-Doping Agency and chair of the Expert Advisory Committee on Education of the Canadian Centre for Ethics in Sport.

David Taras holds the Ralph Klein Chair in Media Studies at Mount Royal University. He served as an expert advisor to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage during its review of broadcasting policy and is the author, most recently, of Digital Mosaic: Media, Power, and Identity in Canada. A regular commentator on both radio and television, he is also the co-editor, with Christopher Waddell, of How Canadians Communicate IV: Media and Politics.
Aritha van Herk is a writer and literary critic. A member of the Royal Society of Canada, she teaches in the Department of English at the University of Calgary and has served on numerous boards, including that of the Alberta Global Forum. One of the curators of the original "Mavericks" exhibition at the Glenbow Museum, she is the author of Mavericks: An Incorrigible History of Alberta, in addition to five novels and many other works.

Christopher Waddell is an associate professor in the School of Journalism and Communication at Carleton University and holds the Carty Chair in Business and Financial Journalism. He is a former national editor for the Globe and Mail and parliamentary Bureau Chief for CBC Television News. He is the co-editor, with David Taras, of How Canadians Communicate IV: Media and Politics.

Ira Wagman teaches in the School of Journalism and Communication at Carleton University. He is the co-editor, with Peter Urquhart, of Cultural Industries.ca: Making Sense of Media in the Digital Age, among other publications. He specializes in communication theory, media history, and the study of Canada's entertainment industries.

Peter Zuurbier is a PhD candidate in the School of Communications at Simon Fraser University, specializing in audience reception, identity, and sports. In a former life, he provided official social media content and reporting for the Calgary Flames.